

Respected Nondini Hussain Editor. Satrong

With interest I have read the article of Jenny Chowdhury : " Nari Nirjatone Narir Bhumika " and your comments on her article titled : " Narir Biruddhe Nari ". The points raised by Jenny are not absolute in the society, but to great extent general. The comments made by you also demand to look at the things from another angle. But none the less, un-fortunately the brides face the problems when they step in the new family of the grooms. The picture is so common in society, yet very few people try to solve the problems to make the lives and stay of the brides comfortable and pleasant. We expect that reasonable and responsible persons in the society should come forward and do something positive to bring a change in the out-look of the ladies at the houses of the grooms. The brides generally come to the houses of their in-laws with golden hopes and dreams in mind, and it is pathetic to see if their dreams are shattered and they face un-wanted problems, specially from the in-laws of same sex. The brides are new in a different atmosphere, so it is the duty of the ladies in the grooms' houses to ensure security and comfort of the new brides. Any way, I would like to thank both of you to bring such an issue to public knowledge. It would be kind of you to invite more writings and discussions on these sort of happenings.

With regards, Md. Abdus Salam
