Sincerely I appreciate your efforts to bring different opinions on one platform. The name Satrong of your web site is rightfully significant, unification of seven different colours to form the absolute whiteness, symbol of purity.

In your OPINION page, I read the views of respected Jenny Chowdhury, who also clarified the same in more explicit and meaningful manner. I have read her two articles on your web page with keen interest. Her topics are rather different from my writings. While I am writing that most of the tortures and atrocities on women are committed by male-kind, she has focused that such atrocities are also committed by other women in different forms and manners. The types of torture described in my writings are in general physical and monetary oppression, but very successfully she has pointed out that various types of tortures on women-kind may be inflicted upon by other women also. The nature of such tortures are mostly mental degradation and silent in _expression. This is in-human in nature.

The new brides cannot express anything loudly at their in-laws houses, cannot vehemently protest the humiliation caused to them, but definitely their souls cry deep inside helplessly. I think this is common for all women around the world, with a very few exception. Those brides are really lucky and they only can find the heavenly pleasure in their in-law's houses.

The writers in your web pages are also very learned persons and their views demand deep attention and concentration of thoughts. Specially your write-ups are unique in nature and approach from different angle.

Thank you again for all the co-operation received from you.
